Chapter 1

Purpose

Chapter 2

Money

2.1 How Money is Created

It starts with government creating IOUs, for example, bonds and treasury notes. They are a promise to pay a specified sum at a specified interest on a specified date. It is a debt owned by the government. In principle, government has created cash, but bonds and treasury notes do not look like cash yet.

The Federal Reserve System then acts as a money printing press to convert the IOUs created by the government to cash. It is called Federal Reserve Check. The Federal Reserve System takes government's IOUs as assets and issues Federal Reserve Check as a liability. The accounting book is completely balanced.

The government therefore received cash (Federal Reserve Check) and the Federal Reserve Check becomes government deposit. It is used to pay government expenses and, thus, is transformed to many government check. Up to this point, the accounting book of the government is completely balanced with Federal Reserve Check as asset and IOUs as liability.

The Federal Reserve Check spent by then government is then deposited by receipts into commercial banks. It is the banks' liability. But as long as they are on hand, it is also banks' asset. Again, the accounting book of commercial banks is balanced.

Through the magic of fractional-reserve banking, 90% (assumed) of the deposit in the commercial banks is available for lending.
